

Cite as: Special Issue, NCTU L. REV., December 2020, at 93

Observation and Reflection on the Development of Taiwan's Foreign Domestic Worker Rights Regulations — Comment on the Relevant Version of the Draft Domestic Worker Labor Protection Law

Chien-Wen Chen^{*}

Abstract

This article reviews the evolution of Taiwan's domestic labor regulations and policies, and reviews the related versions of the draft Domestic Worker Labor Protection Law. For future development, this article suggests that it should be handled according to the following basic concepts. First of all, Taiwan's foreign domestic labor is basically a product of public policy. The supply of domestic labor has a certain degree of publicity, and it should be appropriately manifested and implemented in relevant regulatory mechanisms. Secondly, the labor in a capitalist society is in a weak state, which is caused by the structural factors of the entire economic and social system. Along with the cause and effect of the problem, in addition to providing protection measures from the result side, the solution should also appropriately review the possibility of changing the institutional structure from the source side. Finally, the discussion on the proposal of Domestic Worker labor protection legislation has been in the draft stage for many years. However, the environmental background of policy thinking has changed. The Taiwanese foreign labor policy and normative thinking need to keep pace with the times and change its course. It is also worthwhile. And review.

^{*} Associate Professor, General Education Center, National Taipei University of Technology; Doctor of Philosophy, Faculty of Law, National Chengchi University.

Keywords: Domestic Worker, The Draft of Domestic Worker Labor Protection Law, Labor Standards Act, Working Time